Andy (#420): Your response was an accurate assessment of the UAP phenomenon. One of the most informed researchers on this subject is

Luis Elizondo. According to Wikipedia Elizondo is a former U.S. Army Counterintelligence Special Agent and former employee of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. In one of countless Elizondo interviews that have been posted out on YouTube since the great reveal he clearly inferred that UAP/UFO wreckage has been recovered. He went on to say attempts to analyzed (reverse engineer) have not been very successful. Keep in mind that Elizondo couldn't publicly state as fact that wreckage has been retrieved, but he did beat around the bush by presenting an analogy of what would primitive natives living in the heart of a remote jungle make of a cellphone accidentally dropped into their village from a passing jet? Not only would the cellphone quickly lose power, assuming it survived the fall, there is likely no nearby modern infrastructure (no electricity nor cell coverage) that would allow the device perform its primary function... such as phoning home. Perhaps the natives would eventually get around to finding a practical use for the mysterious object. Maybe they would end up smashing the object with a rock and use some of the glass shards as cutting tools. I think Elizondo indirectly inferred that this is where our best scientists are when it comes to attempts to understand and reverse-engineer what they have managed to recover. As far as photos and other forms of data collection goes, Elizondo did state as fact (and for public consumption) that special defense programs do have in their possession far more detailed data that at present they have no interest in releasing out in the public domain. Elizondo has seen some of the photos himself. He is not allowed to and would not comment on the specifics of what he has seen.

Elizabeth Matson (#420): Scott (#419) Thank you for your kinds words of encouragement. I am looking into different kinds of bodywork, such as yoga and other physical therapies. It's encouraging to hear that yoga was very useful for you.

Scott #420: Yes, my hernia operation went fine. They kicked me out of the hospital later the same day. I'm mostly healed at this point. My abdomen now has a total of 10 incisions. Seven of the incisions were the result of the prostatectomy, the result of robotic surgery.

Jeanne #420 : Thank you for your kinds words of encouragement. It remains a long haul.

Marilyn #420: Should you get the book "The Body Keeps the Score" I hope you will find it useful. I found that I can only read about one section a day. There's so much for me to digest. My EMDR therapist recommended that I take the contents slowly. I'm about threequarters of the way through.

Carrie #420: It is an interesting analogy using "UFOs" to describe past and forgotten memories & trauma. Some experiencers, as certain abductees call themselves, find their UFO encounters enjoyable, perhaps even fulfilling. Others, not so much.

Jim Hudson #420: Regarding what has been disclosed so far on the UAP matter, I suspect it's the tip of the iceberg. In the meantime, you have good reason for remaining in the "unidentified" category. Eventually, I think more information will begin dribbling out in fits and starts. I think the Full Monty is inevitable, eventually. Stay skeptical. Stay curious.

Cathy #420: Thanks for commenting. Some days are better than others.

Jeannie #420: May we all live long enough to figure out what those weird lights in the sky are. Natural or artificial phenomenon? Tourists? BTW, I liked KEEPSAKES.

Hope/Karl #420: It's startling to think that more trauma is generated as a result of sexual assault rather than the ravages of war.
